

The Possibilities of Narrative: A Consideration of Literature as a Key to Happiness after trauma

This paper details the possibility of overcoming psychological trauma through reading, writing and the process of bearing witness. The research covered describes the history and anatomy of trauma including an analysis on how trauma affects memory. The process of bearing witness is then demonstrated through witnessing Jeanette Winterson's metafictional memoir Why Be Happy When You Could Be Normal? A work which connects the benefits of literature (the reading and writing of it) to finding closure from traumatic experience. The author dedicated two years of detailed research sifting through documentaries, scholarly articles, various memoirs and works of fiction to ascertain the minute details of storytelling, experience-taking, and literary theory pertaining to traumatic experience. Overall the research has provided insight into how narrative transforms implicit memory into explicit memory through creating a narrative of the traumatic experience. Finding that the true possibilities of happiness after trauma are discovered through the creation of a narrative; this traumatic narrative assigns meaning to the experience. Once meaning has been assigned the victim then has transformed the implicit (sensory) memory into the explicit (anecdotal) memory. This transition of memory from the senses into language provides a space for metacognition. Metacognition is important because it allows the victim to reflect upon their experience and understand why their body becomes hyper-aroused. The process of bearing witness plays an imperative role within structuring the trauma narrative because the outside objective reader provides validation of the victim's traumatic experience and connection to others who bear witness to the story.
